Defense Intelligence Agency says that NORTH KOREA has already developed a miniaturized nuclear weapon that can fit on top of an ICBM. The number of nuclear bombs is also growing larger, though estimates differ. Global concerns about an evolving North Korean military threat appears to be advancing far more rapidly than many experts had predicted. Rhetoric has become more and more threatening from both sides.

What are the elements of President Trump's policy? How has the U.N. responded? Are these the best policy options? Is the U.S. reading the issues and evidence correctly? What diplomatic tools are available to de-escalate the crisis?

DR. GRAEME AUTON has been Professor of Political Science at the University of Redlands since 1987. Dr. Auton was a NATO Research Fellow and a Ford Postdoctoral Fellow at Harvard's Center for International Affairs. In the early 1990s he took leave from the University to work for the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency in Washington, Brussels and Vienna. In 2006 he undertook a research visit to the Russian Far East and in the fall of 2007 he spent four months in South Korea as a Senior Fulbright Scholar, teaching international security studies to graduate students at Kyung-Hee University, Seoul, while working on a book on Northeast Asian regionalism. He is presently working on a book on the security and political-economic aspects of Northeast Asian regionalism.
